Plenty of time has passed since this band caused a sensation with songs like "The Great Commandment" or "Love Is A Shield". Camouflage have earned a worldwide following in their now 30-year career. Their albums, singles and concerts have proven time and again that they are among the most important representatives of electronic pop music.

Now, with "Greyscale", they release their eighth studio album. The single "Shine" is our first impression. And what an impression it is!

"This is the story, that we should shout out loud"

Marcus Meyn sings these first lines of "Shine" clearly and demandingly, as if to make it clear: This is about something that affects us all. The positive message of the song and the singer's desire for change reaches the listener immediately.

"Shine from the inside to light up the dark night"

It's about those proverbial rays, the fire in all of us, and that we must always rekindle it, because nothing makes any sense without it. Because: It's the easiest thing in the world to complain about things – and the damned hardest thing to simply smile at someone.

Nothing less than the dissolution of the rigid daily pattern is required here.

It's not easy to phrase it so bluntly. It requires a song with at least the impact of "Shine".

Here are the arguments:

A straight machine beat that no dance floor in the world should fear, a powerful bass, a choir, cellos and violins from Babelsberg Film Orchestra. And above it all is the yearning voice of Marcus Meyn, which spans beautiful melodies, culminating in a chorus that can rightfully be declared as an über-hook. All this is assembled in the concise Camouflage sound that the band invented 30 years ago. Every note is a gift, and not a note too many.

Agreed: Ok, we will shine! Thank you, Camouflage.
